COUNTER-MAPPING THE NEIGHBORHOOD: A SOCIAL DESIGN EXPERIMENT FOR SPATIAL JUSTICE

By Katie Headrick Taylor

Dissertation
Submitted to the Faculty of the Graduate School of Vanderbilt University in partial fulfillment of the requirements for the degree of DOCTOR OF PHILOSOPHY
in Learning, Teaching and Diversity
August, 2013
Nashville, Tennessee

Approved:
Professor Rogers Hall
Professor Kevin Leander
Professor Barbara Stengel
Professor Steve Wernke
To my son, Frank Matheson Taylor, for providing me with motivation, perspective and joy throughout this process and

To my best friend, partner in life, and husband, Robert Taylor, for giving me infinite support, kindness, love, and wisdom
ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

This dissertation was financially supported by the National Science Foundation through the Tangibility for the Teaching, Learning, and Communicating of Mathematics grant (NSF DRL-0816406) and the Peabody Dean’s Fellowship.

The research within these pages represents several years of relationships, collaborations, and love for the community and people of Nashville. Completing this work would have been impossible without the support of my friends and family from across Tennessee and the country.

This journey started six years ago when Rogers Hall and Kevin Leander agreed to take me on as a new student. Over these years, Rogers has given me steady and honest mentorship, tireless and thoughtful attention to my work, and has advocated for my ideas, while giving me new ones. Kevin has introduced me to scholars that have proved formative for my thinking, shaped my analytic skills, and provided encouragement and new ideas for my work even when it seemed bizarre to everyone else. I am endlessly grateful to both of them for helping me become the person and academic I am today.

My constant companions on this journey have been Jasmine Ma and Nathan Phillips who provided me with so much support, but most importantly, friendship. We talked, wrote (or didn’t), ate, traveled, laughed, carried cameras, drank (water for Nate), and cried together, too. Without my SLaMmily, this work would have been impossible.

I would also like to thank a late addition to the SLaMmily, Ty Hollett. He has been a great reviewer, critic, reader, and expander of my work. His ideas have proved formative in the analysis of this study.

Also, Jennifer Kahn, Camilla Lawson, Alvin Pearman, and Benjamin Shapiro have been recent reviewers of my work and thoughts. I thank them for their insights and thoughtful attention.

Thank you also to Karen Wieckert for talking me through dissertation writer’s block and helping me to plan a course of action. Her encouragement was key in beginning the writing process.

Dan Furbish has been my collaborator and dear friend throughout this study. His passion for working with and helping youth and their communities, and his steady humility throughout his successes have been inspirational. I am also grateful for his willingness to try new things in his program and for giving me the opportunity and space for developing intellectual and material projects.

I would also like to thank Reveley Lee, a dear friend of mine who began this PhD journey with me six years ago. Reveley’s sudden death was a reminder of the uncertainty of it all. Having her in my life for that one brief year has given me strength in unexpected ways and I will always be indebted to her and her family.

I would not exist without my parents, Mary Lynn and Pete Headrick, and am forever grateful for their steadfast support and confidence. Even when I have doubted myself, they never did and I thank them for that strength. I always try to make them proud and this work was partially fueled by that desire.

I am so happy to have relatively recently found Barb Stengel as a mentor and supporter through this academic journey. She has been an amazing example of intelligence, humor, insightfulness, motherhood, openness, and all the other qualities I try to embody in my own professional and personal persona. I am so grateful for her guidance through these most recent life-altering decisions.

I would also like to thank Kris Neal and Sandra Uti for always offering me words of encouragement and strength. They have been paramount in my motivation to keep going, but to also stay mindful of my family and the importance of being a good person to those you love at all times.

Thank you to Jackie Griffin for always checking-in on Frank and me. She has been a constant supporter and motivator.

Had it not been for my Nashville friends and the love and support they have given me over the years, I would have lost my mind long ago. I thank and love Emily (especially for taking care of Frank), Anne, Molly, Catherine, Mick, Valerie, Adam, Ann, and George.

Thank you also to my brother Gregg, Leslie, Kerri, and Natalka for their remote companionship and support.

I also appreciate all the car trips and childcare Nan Taylor and Mary Lynn Headrick have volunteered. Their pure kindness, help, and love have allowed me to write this dissertation. Frank, Robert, and I have been so fortunate to have them in our lives this past year.

I would also like to thank Frances Matheson, my grandmother and biggest fan. Although she is not here to witness this accomplishment, I know she would be incredibly proud and excited for me. The memory of her energy, loyalty, humor, and sophistication remind me of the person I want and try to be, even in the midst of a large and solitary writing project.

In the spirit of saving the best for last, Robert Taylor – my love, best friend, partner in life, and father to our child – has been a rock-solid foundation on which I have been able to conduct and complete this study. Over the six years this study has been developing and underway, we bought our first house, lost our first house in a flood, had our first child, and figured out other of life’s puzzles along the way. He truly is my better half and I am forever grateful for all of his amazing qualities. I dedicate this work to him and our son, Frank.